PAS MEMBERSHIP VIRTUAL MEETING

TUES, JAN. 11, 7:00 PM

Local Adaptations to a Colonial Economy
In La Florida
By Dr. Danielle Dadiego

We are continuing to meet on Zoom until further notice.

The membership meeting program for this month combines archival research, traditional artifact analysis, and chemical composition and isotopic analysis of glass beads and lead shot to study the role that both colonial and native people played in disrupting or contributing to Spanish colonial economic institutions. See you there on ZOOM. Invite a friend. (continued on page 2)

About our January program and speaker:

Dr. Danielle Dadiago, UWF Archaeology Institute

Glass beads are ubiquitous on colonial period sites, common trade items for Europeans, and, most importantly, socially charged items within native thought-worlds. Lead shot is equally ubiquitous; however, it is considered a mundanely functional item. Although recovered from many sites, lead shot and monochrome glass beads lack diagnostic physical or stylistic characteristics that would make interpretations of production, distribution, and use patterns easy.

Innovations in methodological techniques, including LA-ICP-MS, allow the use of formerly unknown artifact characteristics to trace the distribution of goods across the landscape. These chemical methods are used in conjunction with a close examination of historical documents to provide evidence of how goods moved through colonial and indigenous communities, foregrounding the importance of economic agency among settlers and natives, even when these practices challenged idealized models of mercantilism and colonial government regulations.

Dr. Dadiago is an historical archaeologist working at the UWF Archaeology Institute and Anthropology Dept. Her research is focused on Native and European exchange systems in Colonial America. She is originally from Portland, Maine, and graduated with a BA in anthropology and geography from the University of Southern Maine in 2008. After graduation, she moved south to pursue a MA degree in historical archaeology at UWF. In 2015 she enrolled in the PhD program in anthropological archaeology at the University of California (continued on page 3)

Santa Cruz, earning another MA degree in 2017, and a Ph.D. in 2020. At UCSC she learned new archaeometric techniques to test glass beads and lead shot including chemical and isotopic analyses.

Recent publications after my dissertation include articles in American Antiquity and BEADS. I moved back to Pensacola after earning my doctorate to put my two decades of archaeological experience to good use!
